CHAPTER I.

THE LADY OF THE LAKE.

"Take that, you obstinate scoundrel?" shouted an angry voice.

A splash in the water disturbed the silence about a wooded take, in the midst of wild and beautiful scenery. Such a lake us those of that romantic chair in central New York, but which, under the axes of the sturdy pioneer, have lost much of their picturesque character. The surface was covered by a host of loons, divers and geese, while here and there a stately rane stalked through the reeds along the banks, stooping now and then to seize a water-snake, wriggling by. A small stream of pure bright water poured down a mountain gorge and lost itself in the placid waters of the lake.

The splash in the water caused the loons and divers to disuppear as if by magic beneath the tranquil surface, and the aext moment a man's head appeared above the element into which he had plunged. He blew the water from his mouth, turned a puzzled and angry face toward the shore, and swam inward. Just then another man appeared upon the bank above, flushed and angry, muttering curses against the man in the water.

"What did ye do that fur?" gasped the involuntary bather, as his feet struck bottom, and his head and shoulders stood out a few inches from the surface of the water. "Do you think I'm going to stand it?"

"You just come ashore and I'll chuck you in again, you born idiot," replied the man on the bank.

"What did I do?" whined the man in the water. "Come, don't be violent, Capt'in Larry. I won't say it ag'in."

"Then come out. But remember, you are upon your good behavior."

"I won't forgit," replied the unfortunate bather. 'You're so darned quick with your hands that a man don't have half a chance with you. Dot rot'a man that's got such a temper as you! I wouldn't have it for all the world."

"If Hungry Bill don't hurry out he won't get out at all," said the man called Captain Larry, coming further out upon the bank."

Hungry Bill obeyed quickly, in evident fear of the threat, and climbed the low bank of the lake, shaking himself like a Newfoundland dog when emerging from the water. He was a broad-shouldered, lean, white-haired man, perhaps twenty-five years of age, with a pair of legs which were marvels of length and thinness. He was dressed in a greasy suit of homespun, which had once been green, but which age and use had robbed of its original color, until it appeared to be of a dirty brown. His tailor could not have been an artist, for the long arms of this specimen protruded at least six inches below the sleeves of the coat, and a section of filthy stockings appeared below, while a yawning gulf displayed itself between the waist-coat and unmentionables. Further adorned by a tattered pair of moccasins, and a coon-skin cap of dubious look, "Hungry Bill Epps" stood confessed.

His companion was a man a year or two older than himself, the beau ideal of a forest ranger. He wore the neat uniform of the Colonial Rifles—a corps much esteemed for soldierly qualities-with the exception of the cap; which was, like that of his companion, of coon-skin, with the difference in favor of cleanliness, and having three barred tails upon the side, while Hungry Bill's cap displayed one dejected appendage, limp and ragged. A look at the face of the soldier would have been sufficient for any man of honor, for it was a face to command esteem-open, frank and handsome. His hair, worn long after the fashion of the day, was suffered to fall unrestrained upon his shoulders in dark, curling masses. He wore mustaches, of a rich, dark color, and when he smiled revealed a line of white teeth which added to the charm of his face. His figure was perfection, just above the middle hight, straight as a cedar, with long, sinewy arms and broad shoulders. A black belt encircled his waist, in which a pair of handsome pistols were thrust, beside a long, silver-hilted dagger. He wore also a short cut-and-thrust sword, with a richly-chased scabbard, and hilt like the dagger. In his right hand, the butt resting on the ground, he held a heavy rifle.

"Now, Hungry Bill," said the young soldier, "listen to me, and see that you pay due heed to my words. Do you know any thing of a stranger, said to lead the life of a recluse upon an island in the lake yonder?"

"Capt'in Larry-" began Hungry Bill.

"I believe I shall have to give you another souse," said

Larry. "What makes you hang fire in that way?"

"Cause I've got princeples!" roared Bill. "Cause I've give my word, and swore by the big horn spoon I wouldn't take nobody to the island, nor tell 'em a thing about the island. Now, see here, Capt'in Larry Austen, I've thought many a time I'd part comp'ny with you and I find no time so good as the present. Let's agree to quit."

"In other words you propose to discharge me from your service?" said Captain Austen, laughing.

"Leastways in a contriary sense," replied Hungry Bill.
"You let the island alone, can't you? You ain't got no call to go thar, I opinionate."

"But, I propose to go there this very day. And further, I propose that you shall take me there in your canoe. What do you mean by this nonsense? I know as well as you do that some one inhabits the island, and do you think I would go there to do them harm, you blockhead?"

"Who said there was anybody thar?" growled Hungry Bill.

" You did."

"I didn't."

"I say you did."

"And I say you lie!"

Captain Austen made a bound at Bill and grasped him by the shoulder, while he uttered a cry of dismay, and clasped his arms around a small tree which grew upon the bank. Austen tugged at him in vain, for nothing would make him loose his hold. As the captain was pulling at him with might and main, Bill's strength suddenly gave way, and both men went down into the clear water of the lake with a resounding splash. The contretemps was so sudden, and the retribution so just, that even in the act of falling, Captain Auster laughed aloud. The laugh was brought to a sudden termination by a rush of cold water. He released his hold of Hungry Bill, and stood up as soon as he could, and the pair stood facing each other in about three feet of cold water, two of the most ridiculous looking objects in the good colony of New York. As they stood there, a merry laugh sounded in their ears, and a boat shot out of a little sheltered cove near at hand, and passed within a few yards of them, the occupant singing a merry song, evidently reflecting upon the unfortunate predicament of the captain. Austen turned, and saw the boat not twenty yards away.

"Ha! ha! ha!" rung out the sweet, clear voice. "The biter is bit! Remember the old proverb, mon beau capitaine."

"The deuce!" muttered the captain. "Bill, who is that?"
But the oracle was mute. Climbing out of the water, he sat down on the bank, looking at the boat, which lay lightly upon the surface of the lake, not moving except as the slight wind touched it.

"A pair of impromptu bathers," cried the occupant of the boat, turning her face toward the shore. "Alas, poor gentlemen! I fear you are very wet."

"Madame," said Austen, "I shall esteem it the greatest pleasure of my life if this wetting shall give me the great honor of your acquaintance."

"But, unfortunately," said the lady, "it will not do any thing of the kind. I do not propose to make myself acquainted with you, and I already have your name, as you see."

Austen looked hard at the boat and said nothing. A woman, and one evidently young, occupied the light craft. She was dressed in a garb suited to a forest life, although it was of rich material. A sort of kirtle, of strong blue broadcloth, reached nearly to the knee, set out by skirts with a red border, which showed below the kirtle and reached to the knee. A pair of Turkish trowsers were fastened at the ankle by small silver buckles, and her feet were covered by dainty moccasins, worked with a skillful hand. Her hair was of a rich brown color, and she wore a Scotch bonnet of blue cloth, with a plaid border, which gave her a jaunty air that was quite enchanting.

Her hands were small and delicate, though somewhat browned by exposure to the sun. Her face was cut in a beautiful reald, firm lips, a delicate mouth, and checks in which the fainte to peach bloom was revealed, while her teeth were like peach. Austen stood spell-bound, gazing at this beautiful sirl, and won bring from whence she came, while Hangry B.H sat upon the lank, whistling, and cying the lady furtively

" Bill Epps," said the lady, saddenly addressing him.

Bill started as if a shot had struck him. "Yes, miss," be seil. "I didn't tell a word, and no more I won't. He shall cut me into inch pieces first."

"You are a noble fellow, Bill," said the lady. "In spite of your homely face and figure, you have the heart of a hero, and would not try to intrude your presence where it is not desired, as this gentleman would do."

"Lady," said the captain, who was standing upon the parrow belt of sand which ran along below the bank, "listen to me. I am not a men to persecute a lady. Say to me that you desire me to keep away from you ler is land, and I will do so, upon one condition."

"And that condition, sir?"

and yours."

"No danger can come to us here, sir," replied the Ldy. "Who would do injury to those who offend no man, and only sock to end their lives in peace and quiet in this desolate spot?"

"You do not know the subtlety of the Inlian, or his innute cruelty," replied the captain. "It would be enough for him to know that you have white blood in your veins, and then he would detroy you. I know that banks of Inlians are already on the war-path, and that there is danger to the outlying a till part."

"There is no dencer to me or name," per it I the laiv.

"But premier me this. You seem to know my me enter, but here is the order of the first in him. A rough Mercury, but here the order of the order has an induction of the word, and he wall posit to me, and if I am above the earth you shall have aid."

Something in the chivalrous bearing of the young men touched the hely, for she looked at him with a become less manner, evidently pleated by his proffer of friend hip.

"I then't you sir." she said, softly. "I happened to everhear your controversy with Bill haps, and has retail to tell any thing of the secret which by accident was placed in his heping. I thought you one of these men who, to real carelessees, wi had to penetrate the screet of the place. Do you provide that, except I am in real dancer, you will not follow me?"

"It is a hard condition," he replied. "But—you have my promise."

"Thanks. Then you have mine as well. When I am in danger I will send Bill Epps to you, and claim your premise so nobly given. I must now hid you good-day."

"Will you not even that me with your mane?" be will

"Your question is answered by this. Call me Perlita. One name is as good as another to me. And since I have lest all, friends, name, and station, there is no letter name than that. Perdita let it be."

" But-"

"One thing more. Do not question Epps. If I know any taing of his character, he would not reveal any thing he knows, if laid upon live coals."

"Bet yer life," muttered Bill.

The head of the boat swung swiftly round, the car of the into the water, and, like a bird seeking its not, took its way toward the rocky island in the distance. A jutility point is a hid her from view, still public, with a practice blance back at the pair, while, with the water deliging from his drenched clothing. Captain Laurence Auton soon approache narrow sand beach, like Niobe, the picture of voc.

Who was this strange girl, who called her of redding of come and went like a vision? Why had she traced in Bal Epps—Hungry Bill, the batt of the gardenesses would not trest in the leader of fishing in the own circle in Albany, and the breaker of helies he are all not be of health and a large of health was in that early day when the colonial had been watch and ward over their day when the colonial is, the first in Canada, and their still more can seroes alles, the flat return St. R. sts. Captain Austen was known for an example as gallant In it in-fighter and was distinguished for 'revery amounting almost to madness, when in the face of the energy. His present expedition had belt him through this section, and his mission was to discover whether the Indiaes were really upon the war-path, and to what extent the Six Nations were disaffeered, as it had been white pered that the On it is not had oring meaning to do, further than to explain the presence of this young man in this wild region, with but a single companion.

Hungry Bill still sat up on the bank, knocking his lasts in a discensorate manner against the stenes, and less our fact the disapporting boat. As it now do not point, he gave a simulated plant where he left it off.

"How cam you to know that this beautiful girl made this leve her love?" said Austen, taking a sout beside him.

Bill hold let him in a representation accert, in passed his hard acres his nose, very much as a mandees who thanks his nose is bleeding and is disappointed.

" You heard me, Bill?" said Austen.

"Now, that wen't do, you know, capt'in," replied Bill, in the same mournful tone. "You know it won't. It's a good plant, but what's the use? I ain't book-l'arm, or any thing of that sort, but I know how to ke pany 'on we between my teeth, and I mean to do it."

"You are determined to tell me nothing of this hely who calls hereif Perdita?" said Ameren. "Then your pretended attachment to me is all a sham."

"Att.chment be dermed." said Bill. "I ain't got nothin't to say to that. I promised not to tell any thing about the little gal, and I goess Pli keep my word."

"Of conse, of conse. I did not wish to worm your saone out of you, BH," said Austen. "Only I would give 'I'll counts on to know about this lady and where she lives,"

"You couldn't give it to me," said Bill; "so it den't matter. Now, then, hedn't we better attend to business, unlest yea'd like to siter me into the water ag'in. Sait yourself; I ain't particular, nohow."

"Pshaw. You know how hasty I am, Bill."

"Rayther hasty, I allow. Waal, ain't we a-gcin' to eat nothin' to-day?"

"Eat! Do you want to cat again? Where does all your food go?"

That's an open question. I'm hungry ag'in. I seem to be hungry all the time. Jest wait a bit."

CHAPTER II.

FOUR TO ONE.

Hungay Bill took up his haversack, which, luckily for him, had been lying on the ground during his controversy with the captain, and unclassing the buck's drew out an incompiece of bason and a piece of corn bread, of corresponding size. Then, sitting upon a log, with the bread in one hand and the bason in the other, he began to eat in a manner which spoke well for his gastronomic powers, but would have carried desorbation into the soul of the man who was forced to feed him. The captain looked on with a smile, and Bill watched him in a half apologetic way as he took a large, semicire har bits out of the bason, with his head very much on one side.

Our captain looked on in silent admiration, until replaced took place, and Hungry Bill, hungry no more for the proceed up his haversack and slung it over his shoulder. The extro placed up his rifle, slipped a back-kin shoulder. The extro placed up his rifle, slipped a back-kin shoulder. The extro placed up his rifle, slipped a back-kin shoulder. paces to the right. Beckoning to his companion to follow his example, the young guide took the cover from his rifle, and change I from the hungry, careless boy, to the woodman will for battle. His gray eyes flashed, and his step was that of the panther creeping on his prey.

Hush!

The click of steel became louder as they advanced, and mingled with it came a hurried breathing as of men in deadly conflict. Bill Epps parted the bushes with his left hand. had ling his ritle ready in the other, and peeped in. Captain Austen did the same and saw who made the noise which had time! them from their course. Three Inlians, in the dress of the St. Regis of the lakes, were assailing a single warrior, whose dress, and the war-engle on his nakel breast, told that he was one of the great Oneida nation. He stood with one foot thrown backward, bearing his weight upon it, like a timer really for a spring, holding in one hand a heavy tomat tak, alrealy dyed by the blood of his enemis, and in the other a long limite purpled to the bilt. Austen could not repress a stat of suprise and admiration at the noble figure of the young Indian. Standing nearly six feet in hight, with museular shoulders, powerful limbs, and brawny Innls, he was a picture of forest comeliness. His dress was of brek-skin, ornamented by beads in finciful figures, in which the Indian women so excel. These workings were the totems of the tribe, the eagle, and the lesser totems Lucied down from time immemorial to the people of the Six Nations. His opponents were strong and wiry men, the pick of a nation at all times warlike and aggressive, whose eyes sparkled with rage as they struck again and again at the resolute figure of the Oneida, who, with a smile upon his light even in the face of such fearful oids, war but off their blows. At his feet, with a gory muck upon his fere is alwhar that terrible hatchet had fallen, lay a lance In d. u. and over his body his comrades pushed forward to avenue him. List cars of Lauren et Arriva. Twile he was on the point of rushing out to the aid of the noble young Oncida, but as often had been restrained by the hand of Bill Epps.

"Let him alone," whispered the guide. "I know the chief, and he would think it an insult if you went to help him now. Oh, ain't he just glorious!"

"Noble fellow!" said the captain. "He must not be over-come."

When the young chief apparently turned to fly, Austen raised his rifle, but once more the guide held him back. "Don't do it," he said. "I smell a trick here. You will see in a moment. Ha! look at that! Down he goes!"

The last exclamation was elicited when the Onei la turned upon his pursuers and struck the foremost to the earth. The close grapple with the fourth followed, and Bill Epps thought it time to act. Drawing his knife from his belt, he darted from the thicket to the side of the combatants, when one of them released his knife-hand and struck a terrible flow. The next instant the Oneida rose to his feet, recling, and looking fiercely at Bill Epps through a bloody mist, which seemed to hang before his eyes.

"Come on!" he murmured. "An Oneida never yiells."

As he spoke, he tottered like a pine before the ax of the woodman, and Bill Epps caught him in his arms and laid him gently down, shouting for his companion:

"Here, capt'in! Hurry up. Don't ask any questions, but work. Tear off that calico huntin'-shirt from you dead Injun, and tear it into strips. This poor fellow has got it ball'

" Do you know him?"

"Know him? I guess I do. Why, it is young Chenango, called 'the generous' among the Oneidas."

"Is it possible? The very man I came to see," said Austen, anxiously.

"Yes, and the best friend we have among the O class, next to the chief sachem. This yer young 'un can draw all the young braves with him, and he always takes them to car she Here, don't be afraid to tear that thirt. That feller wen't get mad; he ain't on it. This is a ballent in the arm, he dished I'm afraid I can't do it up right. Take my canton and rem to the lake for some water. Be spry."

The white-haired guide seemed to have changed plans with the captain, and the officer did not dispute with him, but snatching up the canteen ran with it to the lake at his best speed and returned in a moment. The guide washed out the worst cut Chenango had received, that upon the wrist, and bound it tightly after applying a compress to the upper part of the forearm to stop the flow of blood. It was added could do under the circumstances, and then he attended to the other wounds, which were of less majortance.

"I wish I knowed how to take up that little artery," muttered the guide, nervously. "It ain't done right, I know. Bat how the deuce can I help it? Wait; hooray! Jest you stay here, ca; "I, and see that the compress don't slip off, and wait for me. I'll be back in half an hour."

"Where are you going?"

" No matter. You wait."

He started off at a run, and the young man could hear his rapid feet going back over the ground they had so lately travers. I. What did it mean? Why had their guide left them so suddenly? He could only wait for events to shape themselves. Sitting down by the side of the insensible Indian he lathed his forehead with water, and soon after was rewarded, for he uttered a deep sigh, and then regained his consciousness, and looked with a start of surprise at the figure of the white man sitting by him.

"Who is this?" he said. "Did the St. Regis conquer Chenango in the battle? Then let him die."

"No, no," replied the white man, gratified that the Indian could speak the English language. "Do not fear You were the victor."

"It is good," said the savage. "But why is this? I am weak; I feel like a little child which lies upon its mother's breast."

"You have lost much blood, and Bill Epps has gone for some one to help you."

A smile broke over the face of the Indian at the mention of the name, but the effort to speak was too much for him, and he as an tainted. The young captain bloked with a pity-ingreye up in the strong young frame beneath him, and the unbit with wonder of the sample victory he had achieved over four strong men eager for his blood.

The half-hour passed, and the years man ber not be importent, when he heard the round of humind steps, and special to his feet, gresping his title. He was not sent but no noment, for he saw the energied cap of Henory Barrey or above the bushes, and he stepped into the chole, or hypothesis lowed by a man accorded in like, with a length of the erect, a bliefly frame, and drop the eyes. There was a new thing in this of man, tound so strangely in this savere will-derness, which reminded the young captain of a me one of had seen, but where he could not tell. Who was he?

CHAPTER III.

THE MASKED CHIEF.

THE stranger, without question, walked with a stately step to the side of the Indian, and kneeling upon the carti, laid upon the ground a silver-inhald box, which, when epaced, revealed a case of surgical instruments, carefully preceived and really for instant use. Baising the arm of the vounded man, he looked at the precautions taken by the guide with a sail smile which well became his noble face.

"Your compress has done its work well, Eq. ," he sail.
"It has stopp of the bleeding, and but for that, by this time my skill would have been of but little use. The Ordin may thenly you for a life preserved, not me. I shall only enquite your good work."

He went to work like a moster of sorzery, and with a pai kness and delicacy of touch which was wendered, he to hap the severed artery and handaged the arm nearly and quickly. This done, he rese to his feet, just as the Indian came to his senses.

"He must not remain here," he said. "Even at the risk of discovery, I must take him to a place of sacty. Can year two carry him to the boat?"

Hangry Bill much a signal to his captain, and the two hard the heavy body of the Indian in their arms and earlied him down to the leach. Here, drawn up on the shi ings in I, was the F ht best in which the I by who called hers it Percita was so a that morning. The stranger stooped and removed two of the forward theorems, so that they could by the patient in the boat.

"You must leave your contracts here, Epps," soil the straight. "I begins pardon, sin, but for teasons I can not explain, I must begin for not to jo with us, but to remain where you are for the present. As soon as we have placed this noble Indian in a place of safety, Epps said return."

"I am only rieved that you will not trust me s well as a year of he placed the young captain. "But let it be as you say.

"Epps mas already gained possession of my secret," replied the strater. "In what meaner I need not say. He has kept that secret nobiy, even in the face of procession, and I regard him as my best, I had almost said my only, ment in this colony."

yit, but you just wait tid I git a connec, and if I don't hop you then I'm a sucker."

"I contrust you," replied the olders temon, quick. "You know I trust you. At some those day, sir, perhaps I may be able to explain to you why I am a bound in this wild account not now, not now."

Eggs took his place at the cas; the gentleman—for a gittem in he indoctedly was stock as a into some order that it is a took up in the transpill stakes of the rate, scattering the major, is well-roughled in it, leaving Captain A 1 in some life grapes the narrow telt of sind about the water's object with a way this strange old man, who came like a spect rule twin hold? Why had be trutted Epps, as the girl had don't all how held the grains been a leave that him so quickly?

The bod, unbridgestudy stokes of the outs in the hones of BH Epps, possible of sight to had the same bead in the ar which he had be seen the haly, and Lagrence Auster by a separation of lanciness come up a bian, such as he had never to be fore. He was alone—above in the deep forest. Beace him the bright water over which he could not pas, behind him the limitless forest and the bodies of the dead St. Regis. From whence had these savages come, and what were they doing in this country, the home of their inveterate foes, the Oneidas? They certainly must have come upon some sceret and important expedition, or they would not be here. It was evident that their meeting with the Oneida had been purely an accident, and that their matural hatred of his tribe had induced them to assail him.

As he stood there, ruminating upon the strange events which the day had brought, there peaks I out in the woods lookind him a cry which, once heard, is never forzotten, and he had heard it too often in battle to make any mittake in it now. The mountful, wailing, tremulous cry could be nothing clear than the note which an Indian rais s over the deal of his own nation found upon the trail. The sound came from the spat where the dead warriors lay. The St. Regis had found their dead!

Laurence Austen was no coward. A soldier by prifering · he knew what it was to be in danger, and that never in his life had be been in greater peril than now. He felt a stratute thrill as that sudden cry announced to him the coming of the savages, and he looked about him for a hiding place. He knew that the Indians would not hesitate long before fellowing the trail, which they had taken no pains to conce l. The discovery of the bodies was followed by angry exclanations and eries for vengeance, apparently from many threats, and a comman ling voice was heard rising above the din of the savares; a great silence fell, and the young man knew that they had found the trail. There was only one way by which he might escape. Stepping on stones to hile his trail, he parel gome ditance, and then clasped the trank of a horse bealt to Fix feet from the ground, and climbing rapidly, baried him if in the branches just as the foremost save trappeared up at the bank below, and then leaped down upon the and. He was followed by others, some of whom remained upon the bank, looking down upon the bruch, while others joined their canpanions below. Austen was familiar east the with Indian contuns to know that these were of the same tille as the new slain by Chenango-the St. Regis, ever the faithful allies of the French. They were attering low cries of diagramment and race, as they saw by the marks on the sand that their en-

"Ugh!' said one tall fellow, in a fanciful dress, speaking in the Inlian tongue. "Shall the blood of our brothers cry to us out of the earth in vain? Have these murderers wings, to fly away?"

"White men have been here," said another. "See; does an In lian put such things as these upon his feet? But where is the Oneida whose tracks we saw yonder?"

"Ugh! the white men have carried him away."

"Let us call the white chief," said one of the St. Regis.
"He is very wise, and will tell us what to do."

As he spoke, a firm step sounded upon the bank above, and a tall form pushed its way through the crowd of St. Regis and leaped down upon the beach. The Indians evidently revered him as a leader. Thrusting one or two young warriors out of his path, he stooped and examined the signs upon the sand

"Buh! it is uscless," he said. "Whoever has done this doll has taken a boat and gone his way. Sons of the St. Regis, the heart of the white chief is very sad when he thinks how great an evil this will be to tell in the villages, when we return, if we do not bring back many scalps. Let it teach you to hate the Yengees more and more."

A savage murmur was the only reply he received, but many hands were shaken in a threatening manner across the bright water.

"(io) back to the dead, children of the St. Regis, and prepre to bary them out of your sight. I will come to you when I have safered my tears to flow."

The white chief was left alone upon the beach, and parting the branch's softly, Austen looked down at him. He saw a tain con iderably taller than himself, clothed in a rich dark himtier rarb, but wearing, in a sort of Scotch bonnet, a single a ren feather, as the sign of his rank in the St. Regis. He evil ntly was a man of girantic strength, and his voice had the true ring of command in it. As he raised his head and look I both toward the shore, the young man saw that he wore a mask which ever dhis face to the upper lip. This mask we seemely faster a behind, so that no slight force could tear it off. But there was a bleminh in the man which rained an otherwise noble frame. He was slightly handlacked, or rather, one shoulder to e higher than the other, giving him a distorted and ungainly look. The eye which holded to keeply over the lake was one of wond rfid power, hom and plancing, and Austen felt that the man could be a dan errors enemy. Bending forward to get a fuller view of him, a rott in limb upon which his foot incautiously rested gave way and precipitated him to the bank below, unburt, but full in the sight of the masked chief, whoever he might be. An ten started to his feet, and for a brief space the two looked into each other's eyes with a questioning stare.

"Who are you?" hissed the mask. "I need not ask that, since you wear the accursed uniform of the Colonial Rifes. You are mine, and thus I claim you."

Too proud to cry out for aid, and knowing that it was noted likely to come to the marked chief than himself, the year; captain closed with his Herculean antegonist and exerted all his strength to lear him to the ground. "Larry" Austin was famed in Aibany for feets of muscle, and no crainary man could put him on his back, and this the masked chief found. In vain he put out his almost superhunan strength in the endeavor to raise the young man from the mean back light full upon him; the feet of the captain seemed about ferward left rethe gigan is strength of the mask, he still stool up.

"Curse you!" his red the mask. "I'll have you, by this hard!"

"You must win me ere you wear me," was the cool reply.
"I hope to show you that Laurence Austen is no child in arms. Coll your myrmidons, you may need them."

"Never!" whisper dethe musiked chief. "We will fight this bette out alone. Look to yourself."

They had proved a moment, by mutual consent, while the whispered conversation went on, and, at the signal, they again put out their great strength. It was the leaflest the giants. Up and down the shining sand, but it will for ready to take a lyantage of any slip on the part of the rest the two strong men fought. The pride of the rest of any was proved; he would not call out for help, all height to that while he had the most strength, Austen was a scientific wree in, and that an accident or a mis up might give limithe advantage. That advantage came subjectly. Austensent, I to a mile, and the mask threw himself forward to first the surveyle, when, by a dexterous twill of his body, the equantic covered biascif, and before the mask had time to broke ar in, deposite it han on the sand, breethless and half strand. Surching the dup or from its shouth, the captain in that the throat of his vanquished enemy, who saw that he was overrorn; and was about to call for aid.

"Would you kill me?"

"What che could I do if you bring down the St. Regis on m:?" replied the young equain. "Bowere."

"Stick it to him, captain," soil a voice, suchlenly. "Stick ler hand sure, and then run as of the devil kicked you on cend. The fat is in the fire."

Giving his enemy a rap on the head which would have studied and x, the young man smatched up his ritle and ran into the water to meet Hungry Bill, who was urging his own care, which he always kept upon the lake, with all the force of his arm. But the capacit was not fived to escape so easily, they is then the St. Regis began to sworm down the lank, and capacity a glampse of their leader, lying postrate and small suppose the sod, they rais dia shout of anner, and dish him to the water in pursuit of the young captain. He saw that he was overtaken, and, turning chabled his rifle and swept down the first two who approached, while the dip of Henry Bill's our sounded nearer and nearer.

"Keep back, you this vier hounds" he cried, as he swept the we open from side to side. "Keep back if you value your lives."

Again three or four of them rushed in with their hatchets, he take short atm bed them back. But just then the mask received, and showed a gri'y to them in the Indian tengal At the order, for such it seemed, the whole party rushed in a till of the type party rushed in three canoes' lengths of him.

"Dive!" show it B.B. "Dive like a duck, durn you!" Turowing away his title, which could be of no faither uso to him, the young man obeyed, and disup; cared from the view of the savages in the calm, blue water. At the same ment Hungry Bill whirled the head of the canoe the other way, and waited anxiously. A moment passed and the year a man did not appear. Had be sunk forever in the deep water, never to rise until the deep gave up its dead? Another lattminute, and with a shout of joy, the guide saw the dark hair of the captain rise from the water, far in front. He had put into practice an old schoolboy trick of swimming and r water, in which he had always execled, and put a good distance between the shore and himself. The moneth his head appeared the cance was put in motion, shooting through the water, not in a direct line, but with a zizzig and erratic course, calculated to disconcert the aim of the savages. But, as good luck would have it, they left their firearms on the bank, taking only their knives and hatchets into the water. Two or three who had ritles commenced firing at the white here's guide, but with poor success, for at each shot a will har h came back over the water.

With a magnanimity worthy of a man of higher mak, the guide kept his canoe in a line with the head of the captain, who was swimming rapidly outward, and thus shielded him from the shots of the enemy.

"Ha, yip!" he screamed, as a rifle-ball cut the air close to his face, almost razing the skin. "That made my for her. The rescal meant it for me, I do declare! Never mind; a miss is as good as a mile. Swim on, capt'in; the many clostance we put between us and the shore after I take you in, the better for us."

Hungry Bill, standing upright in the stern of the conce, the long partile gripped in his nervous hands, and the white it in the ding back in the afternoon wind, roused the later of the Indians even more than the escape of the captain. As a mas they could reach their we mons, a volley come shipling over the water toward the tall figure of the guide. More of them flew will and some fell short, but a ratifling a half was heard, and the long clay pipe which was much in the more first time, he stopped, and roused back a definite at the commy, while the captain climbed in over the bow of the captain.

"What is the matter?" said Austen, anxiously. "Are you hurt?"

"Hurt be dirined. Hurt? 'Tain't nothin' I s'pose to break a man's pipe in that unnat'ral way! Look yer; I had that pipe in my mouth. 'Twas a good pipe, and has bin in the ran'ly nigh three hundred year. Yes, it has, by gum. Oh, darn your painted hide, Mr. Injin! Et I don't have your sculp for that, then I'm a sucker."

An l, s raking his fist at the In lims on the shore, Bill took to the paddle, and was soon safe from the fire of the enemy.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ISLAND HOME.

When there was no longer any danger from the fire of the savages, Bill ceased his labor and mournfully collected the shatter I fragments of his pipe, muttering curses against the hand that sped the bullet.

"Thin't no ornery chay pipe, you know, capt'in," said he.
"If it was, do you think I would make such a first over it?
But the truth of the mutter is, that pipe has bin in the fam'ly so bur I hate to lose it in such a damb foolich way. Three has he has he has kept that pipe, and now—"

"I bought it for you in Albany."

" Wha-a-a-t?"

"I benght that pipe in Allany," replied the young man.
"Now dealt pretend to get angry, old boy. Here is a piece of the sem you didn't throw over, and I know old Vander-deals pipes to well to be deceived."

To the opinion's curprise, Bill Epps took him by the hand and shook it warmly.

rry mirel. Come to think it over, I left my gran'ther's piper at him, pade to up in cotton. The fam'ly relic is safe; I could weep tears of joy."

"Nonsense! Don't be a fool."

"Don't be a By sosh! I' settin' to mail I dening! what to do. I go swe'd hatter quit. Here; the chi man ain't goin' to stay with you are slonger."

" Paddle! What fur?"

"As you are going to leave, of course you intend to enimal to enimal to enimal to enimal to enimal to enimal terms and the paddle will be of the to me."

Bill looked at his companion with a vacant star for a norment, then a grin came upon his we and he had that into a load laugh.

"You know how to take the oel man, don't part he sail. This was one of Bill's nearly peculiarities. Although by homeans old, he persisted in calling him olf an old man. "I guess I won't swim to-day any more. Had one of this mornin'."

Just in front of them lay the island behind which the last had gone which carried the sensele solid. Toward this plant the cance tended, shot round the point and blank his had like like hay upon the other side. It was a bountful spot, one of nature's most enchanting scenes. Above then, two landred yards from the shore, rose a dark wood, everyon vines relaging with the foliage of the beech and maple. Of a round shore the ground was as level as a howling trought to the land and had it while his companion each black to the land of they fastened the cance and stee had had the slam. This had, they fastened the cance and stee had the right the had of the island.

"No good to stay here. Come, cisgo," said Bill. at the striking out on a fast walk.

The young captain followed. His courset is the Mr. My toward the center of the idead, pechieval relies which a nor passall the path until they care stall thy into a little opinion, in the center of which a hat of handack box his hadden a setup. "Bill Bigs." coled Perdita. "Have, buryed me?"

The gaille stood before her with how, ! I. d. like a school-boy about to be punished.

"I didn't think you'd be here, miss," he said. "I thought

" What tribe are they?" she said.

" St. Regis."

Priling may doubly pale at the name of the tribe, graped for to the and hid her hand upon her beson. "The St. Regis!"

"It's so, miss," said the guide. "You see, the chief here fell in with four of them, and had a little misum berstan lin' with 'cm. Them four Injins won't hurt no one no more. They ar' St. Regis, bet yer life. I know the brook."

"Stay here, both of you," said the girl, eggerly. " You are right, sir. The time has indeed come when we shall need your help. The St. Regis here!"

She caught up the Scotch bonnet, which lay upon the earth near at hand, and ran out of the hut, evidently winged by fear. The young captain looked a movest in surprise at his companion, and then, stooping low, he looked into the face of the wounded Indian.

"He sleeps well," said he. "Your surgeon is a man of skill, friend Epps."

- "Yans, yans; but yer life. He knows what to do. Ward, as we've got to wait a little while for the gal, I goz s I'll take a snack. This chap is pooty hungry, I allow."
  - " C'un you think of cating at a time like this?"
- "Waal, capt'in, this coon thinks he kin. Anyway, he'll make a big try at it."
  - "What are you going to eat, then?"

"Hold your hosses, captin. I'll show you in half a minit.
This critter never goes without his folder, you know."

Pushing aside a heap of leaves near the head of the sleping Indian, Hungry Bill drew out a small, chlong paper lox, which, when opened, revealed several large slips of frict venison and some bread. Twisting his face into verious shapes expressive of the highest enjoyment, Bill be an to develop the savory food with a relish which no danger could take away, and a determination which nothing could david, while the young captain laughed in spite of himself.

"Wittles is wittles, capt'in, and I kin spoil my shar.".

"I should say that you could," sail Aa ten, as he was him stuff a piece of venison half the size of a nam's hand into his mouth at once. "Take care you don't choke your M."

"Not a choke,' said Bill, speaking with some 'll' 'ly.
"Mortal pizen, why don't you cat sathin'? That little mandel chis feet of derstandin' with that ugly cuss they call the manked chis feet of make you hungry. It allers does me when I have a fight.
Look than; the Injin is wakin' up."

As he spoke, Chenango lifted himself upon his unwounded han i, and stared about him in utter surprise. The old man who acted as his surgeon had given him some powerful narcotic, and he did not know he had been brought to the Hermit's Home.

"What is this?" he cried. "Has Chenango passed the silent river and entered the spirit-hand? Who was there to light a fire for him to brighten his path across the deep river?"

"Be quiet," said the captain. "You are very weak, but with a little care you will soon be well."

"Yes, keep cool, red-kin," said Bill, showing himself.
"You got into a pizen diffikilty with a lot of St. Regis braves, an' wiped 'em out, ef you remember."

"Oh, yes," replied the chief. "And my white brothers took me up when my blood was flowing?"

"Twan't no more than I'd 'a' done for any human, but I calkilate I ofter do as much as that for Chenango, the Onei it."

"My brother has a good heart," said the chief. "Chenango will remember the kin hess of his white brother, and the day may come when his heart will grow warm toward the man who saved the life of the Indian."

"Don't bother, Chenango! I ain't goin' to stand any non-sense, you know. This coon is always ready to help those who help him."

- "Listen," said Chenango. "There is a girl among the On i las whose heart is soft toward Chenango. She has broken the sick with him, and will go into the lodge and be his wife. If she shall bring a son in her arms some day to the chief. Chenango will tell her to teach him to love the white heater who stepped the flowing blood of the father, and saved his life."
  - "Oh, get out, now!" said Bill, shuflling his lers unca ily.
- "And for the young war-chief of the Yengees," said the Oncida, turning his dark, expressive eyes upon the face of Austin, "he is my brother, and I love him."

"You are very kind, Chemange," said the young captain.

"I thank you."

I am weary," said Chenango, etting his head drop again upon the moss. "As I lay here asleep, I had a dream. I was not alone in the wigwam. A maiden of the Yerces, fair as a white spirit, came and sat by my bed and some not not rest. I felt a hard, soft as the hand of Natalia, the lave of Chemango, hit upon my forehead, cooling its bandon hag A voice, soft as the whisper of the robin, shor in my car, and table I me into rest. Why do I wake and find it I have from me? Did the Great Manitons not to me Natalia Clothel in the form of another, to give me rest?"

"It was no dreem, Caenango. A fair white mail a was sitting by you when we came, but she is gone new."

"Will she not come back to the chief and let him thank her?" demanded the Oneida.

"She is here," replied Austen.

"Closely. A thick strap pass from the upper put or only the head; another passes under the chin, making the mark a sort of skull-cap. It is put on with great care. He is, too, deformed in a slight degree."

- "In what manner?"
- "One of his shoulders is higher than the other."
- "I is not understand that. As A: : a pointed the pistol and palled the trigger, a fire grow! sounded, but only the click of the lock was load. In his haste, the young man had forgotten that he had been in the water, and that his pistols were in his belt all the time. To drop the useless weapon and draw his darrer was the work of an instant, but not a moment too soon, for the looly of the panther appeared again in the air, bounding at the immovable ti jure of the young man, who stretched out his arm and received the heavy body upon the long blade, simed to strike just in front of the shoulder. A jet of hot blood spouted in his face, and he was prestrated by the ruch of the best, and expected to feel her teeth in his then. But, although the heavy body still lay upon him, and he was half blind the the flowing blood, the brate did not move. Sligging from 1neath his savage enemy, Laurence struck a min. But he str. k a deal enemy. The first blow had been fatal, and the limite had gone home to the very heart of the king of the week. itrested by the hand of Providence.

"Good blow," said Bill, shapping the captain on the decider. "Couldn't have done it better my of. That's something to brag of when your black hair is like his," pointing to, the old man.

The path over which they possed was worn sine th and hard ly much use, and led after three paces to a flight of earlien steps, leading upward. Reaching the top, Austen formal hims self in a small room, perhaps twelve feet each way, do thy the hand of man out of the heart of the hill. "Come and see how we got the air," said Perlin, as the chief sunk down upon a pile of skins in one corner. The eartain followed her into the next room, and she removed there stones of different sizes from the wall, and showed him that upon this side the wall was not much more tion a feet this k and was strengthened by saplings forced into the eath, above and below. - "Then this child must speak the truth. You sin't yet a couch to go into the darker I must go into. Can you erroll like a snake, and wake no echoes or rustle in the bayes? Can you walk as softly as a panther, and step on a stick without breaking it? Can you tell the cry of a loon that is a loon from the signal-call of the Indian, and see craft in every broken twig, and leaf turned over?"
  - "I am afraid I am not an adept in these thirgs."
  - "Then I guess Hungry Bill would do better by Lines If."
- "You do not know what you say. This man with the mark troubles me more than I can tell. I must know him, I must find out who and what he is. Why does he wear a mask? Why does he not come out boldly in the face of day, and let all men see him as he is?"
- "Doubtle's he has his realons for this," replied the explain, "I am half inclined to think you had better let Bill have its way. He is a born scout, and you would only hanger his movements, I am sure."
  - "You give me this advice?"
  - " I must."
  - "And you, Perdita?"
- "I do not think you have any right to risk yet life to lessly, father. Bill Epps knews every foot of limit is lessly the lake shore, and how to track the savales to their dens. Then why should you, who have no such knowledge, after it to follow his steps?"
- "I only wish Changup was strong and half will Bill, "and wouldn't we made the St. He is her to their help ? I have a it's about time to no. Let us arrange our sign."
  - " You are careful."
- "Got to be, in the ctimes. This boy has held to any place quarters with highes not to know his pair pay well of this time. Now bok. You all know the call of the hear, don't you?"
  - " Tes"
  - "Then let the beneall be the signal. If I give it three

If you git it once alone, followed by the scream of the pattern, that means danger for y . So lay low and keep dark, and let this coon work?"

Bill prepare i himself in his own way. He stripped off all superbooks clothing, wearing only his greasy buck-skin trowsers and a calico undershirt, with a belt about his waist, into which he thrust his knife upon one side, and the dagger of Austen upon the other. His ride he left upon the floor of the rolm, and was about to go out, when a thought seemed to strike him.

"Let no man undertake any such work as this on an empty st main. I'd hate to die hangry," he said. "Ain t you got a bite of something handy?"

" Pooty nigh."

"Then take some of it with you and eat as you go. I think there is no time to spare."

He hardly thought Bill would take him at his word, but that individual at once spitted four slices of venion upon his dagger's point, crowned the whole with a slab of corn bread, and started.

"Provisioned for a siege," said Austen, looking at him angrily. "Will you never conquer that deprayed apposite?"

"I guess I will in time," replied Bill. "I work hard to conker it, but it takes a deal of venison to do it."

"I will show you the way out, and go with you to the capoe," said Marstowe. "Remain here with the chief, Perlita."

Listening as carefully as they could, they could be even hear the stroke of his puddle, and knew to what perfection Bill Epps had brought his Indian habits. The old man returned to the cave, while the captain sat down upon the headland, to await the signal of Bill Epps.

CHAPTER VI.

HUNGRY BILL IN TROUBLE.

He sat there in a sort of waking dream, looking out across the dark water, thinking indistinctly of Perdita and Marstowe, of Cachargo and the masked chief, and wondering what connects in that strange men had with the new friends he had in clethal day. He was evidently a man of importance among the St. Regis, clse why did they obey him in every thing? He was provided his achievement in overthrowing a man of his the series power, and was going over the straggle in his mind, when the light of a torch gleamed out for a moment on the lake in front, and disappeared as suddenly as it came. Then it all amed again, again appeared and he saw it no more.

He spring to his feet, and ran out upon the headland as for as he could go, until he stood directly over the cavern home of Perait, and her father, twenty feet below. Lying the strice upon the bluff, he period out across the water, and satisfic inhased that some hand of craft was slowly approaching the lead. As it drew meter and placed under the bluff, he made out two men astribe of a lor, which they proposed by means of that pieces of wood, such as we see orithm along the back of any take or river. He could make out their planed in the respective call of Bid Epps, signifying darger to those on the island.

"Your call did not come too soon, my friend," he thought.
"Let us see what can be done."

Lifting it carefully, without noise, he bent ferward, and threw it with all his feres at the head of the heartst savage. He heard a duil, consching sound, and have that he had not mixed his mark, and the leading Indian is lied into the water with a broken skall. The second man, in alarm, endeavored to back out of the darreness position in which he found himself, but the captain was to quick for him. Throwing himself over the blad, he had ! upon the head and shoulders of the Indian with a shock which nearly shook the breath out of his body. But he was a powerful savage, and quickly recovering him elf, grapples with his foe in a determined manner, which showed that he had no design of tamely yielding to the enemy. He had an a ivall go over the captain in one respect, for while he could cling to the clothing of the soldier, his own body was late, with the exception of the breeze-clout, and his skin was behicked with the oil of the will goose in such a way that to grapple with him was next to impossible. The water was not deep, and the two Lach strattled to their feet, with laboring breath and strained muscles. Austen had managed to seize the metal by the wrist of his right hand, and he could not use his knife, the he he strangled to get his hand free for that purpose. So in the this was useless, his calcuvor was now to got into deper water, and there force the young white man to loose his hail. I fear some evil has befallen him."

"I think not. If he is in any personal danger you will surely hear from him. He is doubtless lurking about the camp of the masked chief, seeking to gain intelligence, and it is evident that he has already discovered that these fellows have come over to spy upon us, and given us the sign. Ha! strike him! Do not let the villain escape!"

Their conversation was brought to a sudden close. The In lian at their feet had been "shamming Abraham." Taking advantage of their conversation, he rolled suddenly out of their reach, and leaped from the bluff, followed a moment after by Austen. But he was too late, for when he gained the sand below, the savace was already half a dozen yards from the shore, astride of the log, paddling for his life. Austen railed his pistol, the companion of the one he had tried upon the panther, but, as before, it missed fire, and the savage escape I.

"I do not like that," cried Austen. "He will tell them that some one clse besides Bill Epps and myself are on the island."

" Hark !" cried Marstowe.

They heard the signal which called the captain to the other shore, pealing out across the water. "I must go. Where is your boat?"

"Wait here a moment," cried Marstowe, with ear rass.
"I will bring it directly."

A moment after the young man heard him call, and heaping down after him, found him standing on the shere, healing the light boat which Perdita had used. Austen sprang in and seized the ours, the old man sat in the stern, and the leat shot out in the track of the flying Indian.

"(five way!" cried the old men, eagerly. "We may ran that secund relly Indian down if we take care."

The boat seemed to fly across the water, under the vicerous strokes of the young captain, while Marstowe best empty forward and scanned the dark space between him and the shore.

"I see him," he whispered. "Row (s.y.) never rowel before. I will steer you upon him. He do s not see as yet. One stroke with the right hand. Keep her steady. Ah! he sees us. Lay down to it; pull hard."

The Indian on the log had seen his pursuers, and was necking fractic efforts to escape, but the heavy log moved like a small, compared with the rapid movements of the skiff. The savage looked over his shoulder and redoubled his efforts. But, a han hell yards still separated him from the haven of safety; not much on land, but a long stretch on water for the last minute of a desperate struckle. Ten feet of water only showed between the savage and his foes, when they saw his tall from tower up suddenly upon the log, and heard the sublen plunge, as he dove into the bright water.

"Row on," whispered Marston. "Heavens! he will es-

The young captain gave three rapid strokes and then paused. He has what if the savage came up at all it would either be close to the share or somewhere near the spot. He was not mistal in. Just then the moon struggled from behind a cloud and shed a mellow light upon the same. Bill, pinioned by both arms, yet struggled flercely, and the captain turned back to his aid.

"Keep off there!" he shouted. "Wha-a-t? Do you want to be taken, and leave the lettle gal alone? Let the old man take care of himself."

"You came to my aid. Shall I leave you in paril?" shout-ed Austen.

CHAPTER VII.

WHAT BILL HAD DONE.

The savages ran up to the verge and looked down. There was a ripple in the water where he had disppeared, and as this subsided, they looked to see the guide rise to the surface, and some of the others, who had come up, waired to launch their temphawks at his head. But he did not rise. Whether he had been wounded when he fell, or had hart himself in falling from that great hight, they did not know, but it seemed certain that the days of Hungry Bill had come to an end. Austen paused in dismay as he saw the water cease to circle about the spot where he had gone down, and thought that he had died for their sake. The case dropped into the water and he let the hoat drift where she would, while he covered his face with his hands.

"Hyar, you," sail a voice close to his car. "What y a doing? Heip the old man in, for he's mi bty tire", he is."

Af radictly contributed the light bear into the inlet of the stream, and here the guide and captain landed. The place where they reached the shore was so overhung by bushes that they could lie hidden from the sight even of a man standing on the bank directly over their heads.

"Why not leave the boat here and let all three set out on this expedition? You may need strength more than you have,"

"No," said Bill. "You row out into the lake, and just abreat of the St. Regis complire—you kin see it shining now—and by that till you hear the horned owl hoot. Like this."

He gave the note of the night-owl with such believous exactnes that the young captain looked up to see where the bird set. This strange man was a perfect mocking bird in this respect. He could imitate to perfection the note of any of the birds of the forest, or the cry of any of its beauts. He did not seem to think it any thing of a feat, either, or that there was a possibility of its being a cause of suspicion to the Indians.

"Never you mind what I'm going to do," said Bil. "It's something that must be done right now or we'll hev a hornet's nest about our cars. Rec'lect the signal, and don't have no feolishness about going with us now, 'cause I won't stand it. Now, capt'in, git out. Push off, Mr Marstowe; the old man wants to see you out of the creek safe."

Must over reluctantly consented, and paddled carefully out of the river, or creek, properly speaking, and left the two menstanding alone upon the bank of the stream, under the over-thinging boughs. It would not do to stay there if they meant to do any thing, however, and the two crept carriers by up the bank, for, though not as well posted in wooderaft as Hangry Bill, Austen was no tyro, and had tracked Indians before now.

"Come it easy," said Bill, with his mouth pressed against his companion's car, so that the whisper should not be land. "Look out for sticks. The first you break means that we must get up and dust. Keep your eyes on me and don't bey a word."

And a nodled, on I rising slowly, and keeping their to he his inclined, to catch the shi litest sound, and to see that they stepped on a thing which might be tray their where the test to the enemy, the two men crept contionsly forward. The can pathe of the enemy glaunch before them, upon the back of the

To those who have never seen an Indian burial, there is an thing imposing in the highest degree. The body of the ship large, in has war paint, was rested upon a sort of platform in the middle of an open space, and around it, in solution or he, moved the stately procession, healed by the racked chi hand the haldbrook mentioned by Bill. Several women were in the procession, and marched with the braves, heeping up that mournful chant.

Bill the hell his companion's arm, and signeded him to come on. Here's yell silving, and passing the spot where the his dish much was going on, they moved down the beach to a split lelow the piece where Austen had his strucke with the musical chief. Upon this that they saw a man standing, horizing upon a gun, keeping grant over something, though what it was the captain could not make out.

"You say arre," whispen. Bill. "I'm arter that Injin, and ef he yells, you can save my sculp."

Bill hard up the bank and disappeared, while Austen critical in the shadow of the bashes and wared. He saw has a variable a state, he hing out across the water, and the disappeared of his far-off had beyond the waters of the graduation of his far-off had beyond the waters of the graduation. He rever dreamed of dancer, for his outrains had brught him word that the main they most had he have Bill, was drowned. They had not seen him get into the boat when he escaped.

What did Did design to do? How would be get at the savage without alarming him? The St. Regis stood a hale in it at a trie, which grow out from the bank behind him in the city. In cion, as chestout trees often grow apon the banks of a religious and streets. It was summer weather, and the last the last and a last the last size, but were annoying things to strike upon the bare flesh of a man. Presently Austen saw the savage start, and clap his hand angrify to his head, where one of the half-ripened burs had struck upon his bare crown. The augry muttering he made, and the savage look at the tree, showed that he thought the fall-ing of the burs was the work of some mischievous squired or chipmuck.

"Chut!" he sail, angrily, and leaned upon his gun as lefore. Presently another bur, larger than the last, bumped against his check, and with an angry cry he can up to the tree, and struck upon it to drive out the mischievous occupant.
This was precisely the end which the occupant desired, and a dark form dropped from the tree upon the head of the astonished savage, knocking him senseless to the earth. Before he had time to recover he was bound and gagged, and the guide sign ded his companion to approach.

"What was your object in this?" said the young captain.

"Simply this yer. The masked chief has bin about yer longer than we think fur, and ef you don't believe it, hak at this."

Lying upon the beach at their feet was a large raft, capable of holding thirty persons. It was built of logs of pine, bound together with fibrous roots, woven and interwoven between the logs, holding them tightly in their places. Smaller logs had then been split in half, and hid into the hollows of the larger logs, making the floor almost even. Take it all in all, it was ingeniously contrived, and could not have been the work of a few hours.

"He has been here a week," said Austen, examining the

"So the old man thinks himself," said Bill. "Now then, I guess we kan't leave this raft hyar. If we do, they'd make it warm fur us before to-morrer mernin'."

" How shall we get it mate the water?"

"Have a launch," said Bill. "I was down to Albany when they hunched the 'Yager Boy,' the damedest craft I ever see a floatin', jet as wide one way as she was the other. I look here."

Lesting more carefully at the ruft, the young captain saw that it had been built with a fixed plan, and was built up n split logs inclining to the water. All they had to do was to hanck as sy the shores, and the launch was complete. Austen hargined lightly and picked up a heavy stick which by by the side of the raft.

- "The first time I ever launched a ship," he said. "How that masked chief will rour when he sees that all his work has gone for nothing. Get on the other side and find a club."
  - " All right," said Bill.
  - "Are you ready?"

" Ready."

"Net quite," sail a quiet voice. Both turned and saw the masked chief standing near, holding a pistol in each hand.

it suddenly he pitched it with unerring aim at the head of the masked chief, who threw up his hands to avert the blow, and before he could recover he fell under a blow from the club of Austen. Snatching away his pistols, Austen laid them on the raft.

"Let's get her off as soon as we can," said he. "Off with her."

They struck away the shores and sprung upon the raft, which glided down the slide into the water, and far out into the lake just as the masked chief bounded to his feet, pealing out a startling war-cry.

"I wish we had dared to wait and take that fellow with us," said Austen. "Give the signal for Marstowe at once."

Bill sounded the cry of the owl and the boat of Marstowe soon boarded the raft. He expressed the utmost surprise when he saw it, and understood at once what an awkward instrument it would have been in making an assault upon the island. "I have to thank you so many times that I am at a loss for words, Bill," said he. "When shall I be able to repay you for what you are doing for me and mine?"

"I'll quit you ef you don't shet up," roared Bill. "I ain't going to be bothered to death this way. It's as much as a man's life is worth, and I don't git no peace. Gimme that our, and tie the boat to the raft. We've got to take her over to the island."

Seeing that the worthy guide was determined not to be thanked, the old gentleman gave it up and assisted them in paddling the raft to the island, and bringing it into the little cove where they seemed it and landed.

- "Who goes there?" cried a sweet voice.
- "Friends with the countersign," said Marstowe, foully.
- "Advance, friends, and give the countersign," was the merry reply, and Perdita stepped out of the shadow of the trees. Her father kissed her. "That is the countersign," he said.
  - "Shall I give it also?" said Austen.
- "Upon my word, sir!" said Perdita. "No, I think not.
  Let my father give it for you."
- "And look here, niss," said Bill. "Ef you tell me to take this young man by the nock and drop him boto the water there, the old man is ready to do the job, or bust something trying."

" Wind in, Bill?" demanded Perdita, merrily.

"What far; what far? Di in't the darned brute offer to kiss yen? I'm sp'iling fur a chaince to lick some one and I'd a lettle ruther lick him than not."

"Thank you," said Perdita. "You shall kiss me if you like, you dear creature. I am sure you have done every thing for us."

"Will!" roared Bill, flushing to the very tips of his ears.
"Now quit that, you. What's the use of plaguing the old man. You don't think I'd kiss a gal, do you?"

"Wen'll you kiss me, if I asked you?" said Perdita, wickedly, appraching her merry face very close to his.

"I never thought you would refuse me," said Perdita.

"Il. ve no other way to reward you."

"Callemit!' yelled Hungry Bill. "Git away! Darn a wemen, anyhow; they ain't no right in the woods. Lemme

'lone, will you?"

The emission of the guide was so obvious and his blashes so vivil that a general lough passed round the circle, which stury Bill to madness, and casting a look of fury at his hir termentor, he durted into the woods in the direction of the hat in which Chenango had been lying when they first visit I the island. Hungry Bill was famous for his beshirt essall along the Mohawk, and it was related of him that, when living at home, when a boy, the appearance of any neighboring female was enough to cause him to take to the woods.

"Yes will frighten him away," said the captain, endeavoring the restrain his laughter. "When you approach Bill in that way ha is taken up in his weak side. I'll go and speak

- "You git out," replied the guide, returning to his old whimsical manner. "I guess you've done it already. Now go back and bring me my powder-horn and rifle. I forgot 'em when I came away."
  - "All right," said Austen. "Any thing else?"
- "Wast, of you could manage to bring me a morsel of something to eat, I'd like that."
  - "Oh; are you hungry again?"
  - "You bet I am; dreffully."

Austen laughed, and went back to the party, and they entered the cave together. They found the chief much stronger, and sitting up on his blankets. He received them with a grave bow, and a stately grace which sets well upon the native chief.

- "My heart tells me that the gray-haired chief has done much to give back strength to Chenango," he said. "Is it not so?"
- "Next to Bill Epps, you owe him your life," replied Austen, disregarding the gestures of Marstowe, who would not have had his good deads spoken of. "Perhaps more to him than to Epps, because his skill was greater."
- "This man than is my father," said the chief, rising, and placing the hand of Marstowe upon his heart. "Let him take the thanks of the Indian, for he was kind when the chief had no claim upon him."
- "Let Chenango make haste and get strong again, for the red wolves howl about the wigwam of the Gray Heir," said Austen, adopting the figurative language of the Oneida.
- "Ha! Dare the wolves of the St. Regis prowl about the house of the Gray Hair? Let them fear the wrath of the Oncidas, the strong men of the Six Nations. What chief leads the St. Regis to battle?"
  - "The masked chief."
- "Ugh!" said the Oncida. "Then let my father put a hatchet into the hand of Chenango, and he will go forth and slay the white chief of St. Regis."
- "When you are stronger. The mask I chief can not come to us here, and after three soms Chenango can to out to battle. Until then, let him rest in peace."
- "It is well," replied the chief. "Chemango will listen to the works of the young war-chief, for he speaks good weres." Three days passed and they heard nothing of the masked thicf. The capture of the raft had been a damaging blow to them, and Austen knew that it would take some days to mice another of the same kind. Bill Epps remained in the lat by hines if most of the time, though Chenango spent same I are each day with him, maturing plans for the deformer of the old man and his beautiful daughter. Each day the girl showed more and more the netural graces of soul which were hers, and Laurence Austen plunged more and more into the mazes of that und presion of love, but did not sock of it. He was cortain that this girl was born in an cher sphere of action, for she had read much and traveled in I mis of which he had only heard and read. They had a few choice beoks in the cave, and the two would sit upon the really in all ands, screened from the view of those on si, re, and read from those rare old poets, which both loved so well, and enjoy it too, in spite of the cloud which threater 'them. She would not speak of her past life, though he hinted at it often.

"Do not ask me of that," she said at length. "It would not be once my felier or myself to boast of what we have be not at the glaries of other days. Enough that it is post and in all human probability we shall never mingle in the solity of which my father was once the pride and boast."

" You for this masked chief? Do you know him?"

"I can not tell. My father is in doubt too, and perhaps after all he does not seek us. Perhaps our fears are not well founded."

"Can you think of any one whose interest it is to find you?"

"I can think of one whose inferest it is that we should be taried from the world, and who would rejoice to know that the lat of the race had found a quiet grave, from which they end hever rise to give him pain. But, why could be not be taken as a series and the would never have troubled him, and we did have lived out our lives in quiet, happy in each other's live. I can not think that he is the one, nor is he had a none you do not east the musked chief."

the rat, she was sitting above in a sechuled part of the island, toward the lower end, and under a great tree, from which she could look out across the beautiful lake dotted here and there by islands of varied sizes, covered with vertant feliare. It was a beautiful day and a light backe just sincel the surface of the lake and sighal through the bilinge over her head. The rest of the party were busy upon another I ut of the island and not likely to disturb her. The balmy pir, the numeur of the wind and the song of birds billed her into rest, and she dropped her head upon a mosy knoll and fell asleep. One hand was thrown up to cover he, face from the sunrays, and the other romed limb was underneath her head, and there she slept, a one. She did not hear the low dip of the paddle coming up from the opposite direction from that in which she had looked for the enemy and she slept on, urconscious, until a canoe grounded upon the gravelly beach and was drawn up on the sand. Then a head was raised cautiously above the bank, and the masked chief appeared upon the scene.

CHAPTER IX.

A VILLAIN'S WAY.

Bree Errs was in a rage. Something had happened to disturb the even tenor of his way, and that something was the railing of Captain Austen, who accused him of being in love with a Datch girl upon the Mohawk at Schenettaly. It made no difference whether this was true or not, Hungry Bill would have resented it just the same, and would have denied it up hill and down dule, as he did in the present case.

"Now, Bill," said An ten, on the morning of the fourth day after the capture of the raft, with a sly wink at Perlin, who was standing mar, "don't day it. I know you are in lose with the Datch girl; everylody says you are."

"Then everybody is a darned liter," roared Bill. "I don't even know any gal. See Lere: you want to pick a mass with me."

"Oh, got away, Bill," said Austen, giving him a push.
"What a news.! Do you think I am going to fight in the "Dish't you insult the old man in her presence, say?"

"I have knew that it was an insult to tell that a manhis I a pretty Dutch ghil."

"Darn my buttons of the gal ain't tuk the old man at his word. Look here, you do it think so hard of me as that, do you? You don't believe the old man would leave you in trouble? It ain't his gait. I'll quit you as soon as I git you all safe, though, for a-lying about the old man. Come along, you. I want you to go and help me git my canoe."

"What do you want with it?"

"Some of those pesky natyves will be coming over hyar in it some of these nights, and I don't keer to be shot from behind a bash, I don't. Now whar's that boat, miss?"

She sprung away to get it, and soon appeared upon the shore, coming from some unknown hiding-place where the beat lay. The two went down, and though she pleaded hard to go with them, they would not allow it.

"We may have to go to places where bullets fly like hail," said Austen, "and I would not risk one hair of your head for untold wealth."

Perdita blushed deeply and turned away, and it was after this that the misked chief found her asleep beneath the tree, dreaming of the gallant young captain. Bill was in a bad humor, and when in that mood, did not care much into what danger he ran, but sat in the stern of the boat, glowering at Austen, and thinking over the grievance of the Dutch girl, Katrine Vanderdonk.

"See here, Capt'in Larry," he said, "do I know any Dutch girl in Dorrup?"

"How should I know?"

" Didn't you tell that little gal I did?"

"That was poetic license. They say poets can embellish the truth, and I am a poet."

"Is 'pole' the English of 'big liar,' capt'in?" said Bill, into ently. "'Can e if it is, you are the biggest pole in the world. You be, by gravy, and I don't keer who knows it."

"Take care, Bill, we are getting close in to the shere."

"You be— the drawdst poic in the wild waste of the unit d airth. Stibly; like ex not we'll git a dozen balls through us of we try to land, though I think most of them Injins are up above that now."

The place in which Bill had left his canon was upon the northern side of the lake, for above the Indian camp, and he had take non-pairs to hide it. An ten was rowing, and Bill storie, with one of the extra cars, for the leat carried two pair. They remark the point behind which Bill had left his can equal important list by that permu began to swear like a pirate, much to the surprise of Austen.

" What is the matter?"

"Matter! metter camil! Some uneasy villain has stole my can e. I know'd it; I know'd they'd steal the old man's canoe, bu'st 'em."

" You should have hidden it."

"Did I her time? Oh, merry Moses! I'm so 'tarnal mad I'd like to brist something. Blame his old head that done it."

"We may as well go back," sail Anten. "No use crying for spilled milk."

They palled back, and as they rounded the point of the island and near I the spot where they had left Perdita, the first of Austin II.a. I. "Would you kill me?" she gasped.

"If you force me to do it. Do you think the life of one woman would stand between me and my object? Pah; you do not know me. Come."

"What would you do?"

"Come, I say. Do you take me for a fool? You must go with me to the mainland."

"I will not."

" Living or dead; take your choice."

"Kill me if you will, I will not go with you."

A look of demoniac fury gleamed in the eyes of the masked chief. Twice he lifed the dagger and as often the look of undunted firmness in the eyes of this brave girl stopped him, and he thrast the knife into his belt and caught her in his arms.

"The devil take me if you shall not do as I desire," he said anguily. "Come away. I am your master."

Releasing her mouth for a moment the girl screamed twice, as loudly as she could. Her voice was heard, and there rung out clear and loud upon the afternoon air the war-cry of the Oncida, and they heard Chemago coming at fell speed. With a bitter curse, the mask litted his clenched hand and dished it into the face of the girl with stronging force, and then, placing her in the canoe, he thrust it away from the shore, and grasping the paddle give half a down heavy strokes, which sent him clear of the island jest of Chemago, wild with race, bounded out upon the point of island in full view of the scene.

"White dex," he screamed, "sheking his hatchet in air, "stay and meet the Onei la. Coward, to you har me !"

"Ha! ha! ha! My worthy chief, let these hatch who i. But you should have be ught your ritle."

"A covard wars mon wehat; a great brave sille at men," cried Chenango.

"Thank you. I think the covere's stike the notice property you good day, my brave Oneila. We shall met and."

"Bal," replied the mask ichief, forcely. "To the devil with you. I am no coward, not I; noither will I prid the sake of a combat with you now. But I tell you, red dog that you are, that a time may come when I shall make you repent your in-alts to me this day."

"C me beck, then, and fight," roared the chief, who was almost belief himself with fury. "Do not make yourself a dog when you may be a brave. Come back, and if you slay me, you conquer one who is a chief of his nation."

The only reply was a shot from a pistol, but in his excitenant the masked chi famiss of his aim, though the ball just grazed the circ k of the circ. "Hardly. I have traveled too far to get you to give you up easily. Do not be foolish, my fair maiden. It is mere folly to ask this of me."

"Then you will not take me back."

"Any thing in reason I will do. You ask too much."

"Do you know who I am?" she cried.

"That stately attitude shows the old blood," he said, with a look of admiration. "Yes, I know who you are, mad moiselle."

" And is it for that you wish to marry me?"

"You are a young lady of great penetration. It is for that and nothing che that I desire to marry you. Then you have

PERDITA WOUNDED.

The warning did not come a moment too soon. They had pulled the head of the boat round, and were already in rapid motion away from the land, when a volley from a dozen rifles and several arrows rattled all about them, knocking the splinters out of the light craft. There was no time to pay any attention to the masked chief, who was swimming rapilly toward the shore. As he heard the voll y he turn land balled toward the best, and uttered an angré cry as he saw that all the occupants were unharmed, though some of the balls had whisthat surprisingly near some of the party. "Hark to them, the nour bring finds," said Bill, as he rowed hard for the cause. "Git a paddle and sit in the starn, Chenango. We must have that canoe."

Social their determination, the masked chi f resolved to defeat it, if possible. The canoe was within easy range of the shore, and the best could not approach without great peril to the occipants. Two or three light logs were rolled into the water, and six or eight of the St. Regis plus well in, and pushing the logs before them, swam toward the emoc, which, under the force of a light wind blowing from the shore, was rapilly drifting out of range. Chemingo saw this with a grim smile of apprehation, and knew that the Indians with the lasment swim hard to catch the canon. But, when a hundred varily separated the bout and the cance, and the logs were twenty yards away, they saw the plumed heal of a savere displace beneath the surface, and knew that he ment to swim und r wat r to the caree. As he spoke the boat struck the hand and they drew her up on the leach and walked toward the cavern home of Marstowe, and touching the spring, the manner of which Marstowe had explained to them, they entered. Marstowe rose to receive them and took the hand of Bill Epps in his own.

"Congratulate me, my friend," he said, joyfully. "My child will not die."

Bill Epps waved his left hand over his head and went through the motions of a cheer without uttering a sound, for he knew that the girl must be weak from loss of blood, and he would not have caused her pain for untold wealth.

"Friend, did you say?" he said. "Did you call this old man friend? I'll desarve it at your hands. Don't say nothing more, or you will make a fool of Bill Epps and git him to blubbering."

Marstowe only answered by a slight pressure of the hand, and then led the guide into the other room, where Perdita by upon a pile of robes had upon soft moss, pide as death but looking hopeful. Bill Epps passed the sleeve of his handing shirt across his eyes, and then blew his nose violatly to cover the demonstration.

"Thar, thar, little 'un; don't you say a word. You git well just as soon as you can and make no foolishness. I hope you'll believe this old man when he says he'd rather by thar than see you burt. He would, by gravy."

"I know you would," said Perdita, in a weak voice. "I am not strong enough to thank you as you deserve, my good friend, but I will some time."

"Do not emitate pourself, Perdita," said Mandowe. "My poor, pale darling."

"Dad not his old hile that did it," growled Ball. "I'll make him weep like a child for this! I can rive you got news, though. Channo and I have jet gon out and har that cance, so that they can't git at us with the ty an in."

The trees upon the headlands where they stood were small, so that there was no danger to them and they could enjoy the grand scene.

"Magnificent," said Austen. "I never saw any thing like it in all my life."

The storm seemed to increase in violence. Stronger trees came crashing down, some torn up by the roots and some broken off from the parent stem fifteen feet above the grain l. Every man was silent now, gazing silently upon the grain l scene before them. In the presence of such a scene as this, man feels his own feebleness and the strength and glory of the Creator of all things. The waves, as they struck the healthand, divided into thin spray, which the wind carried inland, and they were covered with the flying vapor.

"This is gitting monotonous," said Bid. "I guess we'd

He had tits of nervousness, and was continually going out to look at the sky and see that the Indians were not yet upon their way to assail them. Knowing something of the determined character of the masked chief, he was certain that he had not been idle during these three days, and had by this time formed some means to reach the island. And he was right.

During the first day of the storm the masked chief had lain concealed under an overhanging rock, safe from the falling branches and where the flumes could not reach him, cursing the unlucky fortune which had brought the storm at such an inepport me moment. The man was ill at case, for he had seen the girl sink down when he mine I the title at Austen, and knew that he had hit her. Was she deal? Had his hand the guilt of that innocent blood? He standdered and plucked impatiently at the mask which covered his fee. While lying there he was joined by the half-breed mentioned by Hungry Bill as being with him. This mun's character furnished little which was interesting. He was simply a blood-thirsty, mercenary wretch, a good tool in the lates of an un-crupulous man, but nothing more, and we have given Lim no prominence in the story. His name was Loui Gerarl among the French, and he was called "La Loup" by the Indians.

This sini ter companion took a sext under the rock, a little way from the mask, looking at him in a covert way.

"Take care, Gerard!"

"I have been revolving the matter in my mind," said the culf-breed, slowly, "and upon my word I do not know that I would do better than to go to him and let him know all about it. Perhaps I might marry the daughter myself, which would suit me well. I—"

Whatever he meant to say was stopped in its utterance, for the iron hand of the masked chief was at his throat, and he was borne back helplessly upon the sod, where he lay with eyes starting from their sockers, making appeals for mercy by signs.

"Dog; cazalle." screamed the mark. "Do get dare to speak of marrying a daughter of a noble house? I will kill you!"

Just in time to save the wretch from a deserved death, passion passed away, and the mask released his hold upon the throat of the vitami, who rose to a sitting posture, black in the face, coughing and spitting blood.

"What was that for?" he gasped.

"Death, seems led. Do you ask me the question? I have a mind to finish you."

"You may have gene too far already," said Gerard, with his hand upon his knife. "Did you dare to cheke me. Look to yourself, for it may make you trouble."

THE MASK REMOVED.

The gallant attitude of the two brave men somewhat astonished the St. Regis, who had not expected to be braved by men who seemed to be in their power. But it roused all that was savage in their flerce natures, and they begun to drop into the passage through the opening. Two liths chacked, and in a secon i's space two souls had gone to judgment. The sivares were now crowded into the narrow space, and Austen, backed by Bill Eps, stood in the doorway at the top of the stairs, and sent four shots from his long-barreled pistels into their crowded ranks. Shricks for mercy, groans of pain, and . shouts of vengetul import, rung through the extern. Up to this time, no one had showed himself except Austen and Epps. The guide would not trust himself with a pi tol, a weapen in which he had no faith, but loaded them as fast as they were discharged, answering the shouts of the St. Regis by a stentorion cry. But seeing the havor which the gullent young man was making among his Indians, the masked chief shouted to them to rush on and avenue their fallen committee. But they met an enemy who did not hear them. Stanling in the doorway, with Bill Hpps at his side, the captain faught for life. His weapon was a long-bluded repier, the property of Marstowe, in the use of which he was an adept, and which he swept them sile to sale. When he straight at his I ng arm a shrick of pain was sure to f How. In that cranged space it was impossible in the Indians to palving more than three abreast, and there were so created that they had scarcely reom to use their were ons.

Bill Epps, helling a heavy batchet in his hand, ably recorded the efforts of his superior, and the Indians in front would globly have lacked out of a troublesome scrape if their companions in the real, at present out of dancer, would have permitted it. They crowned their unhappy colorades upon the backer of Austen and the deally hatchet of Laps, in spice of their efforts to receive. It was the old stratific of the many and the faw, like "Hatchard his Gaebers" in the marrow pass. One by one the Indians dropped, while the two brave men stack unwounded, dispoint the narrow pass. The masked child would have pressed his way to the front, but found it impossible, on account of the crowd in the passage.

"Past praying for, the eld man thinks," roared Epps, striking lown a heavy saven who was pressing them hord. "Call off yer increase or well make miner-ment of yer built party."

The Indians is airly out of find that their triene's were having tradie, and were making tradic efforts to get forward, but in vain. Saing that the two tores ers were making a determined resistance, the chief caled off his men, and they climbed rather hastly out of the passage, followed by the derisive shouts of Hungry Bill.

- "Then ask the man who calls himself Marstowe to come forward. I will treat with him."
- "By no means," replied Austen. "I am the only one you can treat with."
  - "Let me ask you a single question. Is Perdita deal?"
- "If she is not, it is no fault of yours," said Austen. "And if I ever meet you upon any spot of ground on earth where we can cross swords, I will make you repent that dastardly shot."
  - " Dastardly !"
- "Worse than that. None but a countrd would aim a ball at the breast of a woman."
- "Fool! I meant it for you. But, we have said enough.
  I give you until daylight to make up your mind what you will do. When light appears, we will have you out of that, if we have to barrow like rats after you."
- "Good; you shall have a chance to burrow," said Austen.
  "I bid you good-night."

The masked chief retired, and for four hours Austen stood grand at the doorway, starting up at every sound, ready to dispute the passage as before. But no a suit was made until the light of day began to pour into the opening the Indians had made. Bill Epps, who had been sleeping on the hard earth just behind Austen, started up and rubbed his cyes.

- "Any one stirring yet, cap?" he said.
- Not yet. At I set I have heard no one. What do you to preparing a little surprise for our worthy friends."
  - " As how ?" said Bill.

Austen sail something in a low tone, at which is laughed and has our not the passage. In a moment he returned holding his pow herehere in his hand and dropping a train along the grown, taking care to avoid the blood. He had hardly done so when the tramp of many feet announced that the Indians were awake and preparing for the a sailt. crash came, and the door came down with a loud noise, and over it poured the whole band of St. Regis, or what was left of them, mad, desperate. Both Bill Epps and the captain fought with the fury of despair, but what could they do against so many? They were borne down, bound hand and foot, and would have been slain upon the spot had not the half-breed shouted to the brayes to reserve them for a worse fate. The masked chief spring forward to look for his other prisoners, but nowhere could he see them. Search where he would, he could find no trace of the two for whom he had dared so much. He came back frantic.

"Look you, young man. I have a few words to say to you, and see that you answer them promptly. Where is Perdita; where is the Chevalier Marly, otherwise called Marstowe?"

"How can I tell?" replied the captain, with a light laugh. "Impossible to say."

" You lie, I believe."

"Do you? Impossible to say. Do you know where they are gone, Bill?"

"How should I know?" said Bill, in the same tone. "They ain't here, I reckon."

"I will find a way to open your mouths upon the subject. Drag them out, braves of the St. Regis. We will make them atone for the blood which has been shell"

"You have us in your power, and of course you have the privilege of doing as you please," said Austen. "But no torture you can inflict will avail you. I know what to expect, but I will endure it, for the sake of the sweet girl you would have murdered. Thank God, she is safe from you, whetever may come to me."

"Where is the chief?" dem in led a savage, thrusting his painted face close to that of Austen. "Dog of a Yengee, speak. Where is Chengeo, that child of the bad spirit, who has brought sorrow into the St. Regis lodges?"

"You bet he has," said Bill. "Come, captin. They can't hurt the gal now. Tell the pizen snake how she got away"

" You may, if you like."

"Ward, I don't mind. They went away in the beat jest alore you come, and lest us to take care of you. We agreed

Bill Epps cut the leathern straps which bound the mak behind, and palled it off. Marly booked into the face, and staggered back with a look of horror.

"Gol of heaven; my nephew, Edward!"

"Yes, Chevaller Marly, Marquis of Duchay, I am your nephew, I lward. What does it matter? I followed you for the sake of the inheritance which, while you were not known to be dead, rest I in abeyance since my uncle's death. I sought you out in Matreal, but you caped me. I heard of the recluse who live I here alone, and I sought you out. My villainy has recoiled upon my own head. If you were dead, I could claim the title."

"I thought it might be you," said Marly, sadly. "But, this distriction of your shoulder decrived me."

"A part of my discuise. I would have married Perdita, and gained the place I sought in France. That failing, I would have slain you both. My power among the St. Regis enabled me to collect this band, but I have failed. I die as I have lived: a deperate end to a desperate life. You may yet have trouble before you sit in your castle at Duchay."

With these words, he gasped and died. Marly yet kneeled beside him, looking down into the set face, which showed the marks of a riotous life, though proved and noble.

Marly looked up at last. "My friends," he said, "you marvel to see me here. I will explain. My brother was Marquis
